The "fear of pain" in terminally ill patients is one of the major reasons euthanasia or assisted suicide is requested or used. Cundiff's book gives the physician's viewpoint on the current movement to legalize euthanasia. Advocating the training of medical personnel in pain management so they can better treat terminally ill patients, Cundiff also urges having families, medical staff, and the clergy working together to make dying patients' last months and days comfortable. Appendixes include a copy of the "Proposed California Death with Dignity Act," letters from various organizations on their views of human suffering, and a list of references for further reading. Ahronheim and Weber's Final Passages covers all the same topics as Cundiff in addition to providing information on specific terminal illnesses and specific medications for pain relief. A list of resources covers different types of organizations for specific diseases, consumer groups, and lists of other healthcare-related organizations. Both books are very well written, easy to read and understand, and full of thought-provoking information. However, Final Passages is a better choice for readers dealing with a terminal illness for the first time and who need a practical guide. Cundiff's book is an excellent choice for collections dealing with the ethical, social, and medical issues of euthanasia. Judith Ahronheim, MD & Doron Weber Final Passages: Positive Choices for the Dying and Their Loved Ones (New York: Simon & Schuster, 1992) 285 pages A very helpful book for thinking about end-of-life choices, filled with real-life illustrations of people who prepared well for death--and others who did not. Themes covered: (1) Becoming serious and verbal about our own deaths; (2) Improving communications among doctors, patient, & family; (This chapter also includes discussion of the most common causes of death.); (3) The right-to-die and irrational suicide, including physician involvement in ending life; (4) Pain control and comfort care; (5) Clinical depression upon facing death--and treating it; (6) Natural shutting down of the body as death approaches; (7) Hospice; (8) Living wills; (9) Financial problems and planning for terminal care, nursing homes, & death; (10) Emotional responses to the prospect of dying. If you want additional help in getting ready for the end, search the Internet for the following bibliography: "Best Books on Preparing for Death". James Leonard Park, existential philosopher.
