Dawne McCance, educated first as a biologist and geneticist, and later as a philosopher, has produced an extraordinary book. It introduces us to the principal philosophical issues in the areas of animal rights, animal studies, ecology, and ethics in a lucidly argued way, with both breadth and depth. The major contributions of feminist thinkers, of religious traditions from all over the world, and of Continental European thinkers above all, the remarkable work of Jacques Derrida are presented in a clear and comprehensible way. The writing and thinking are always pellucid and dependably profound. No reader will ever forget the preface to the book, Chopped Liver. And no reader who works through the book will fail to be grateful for this comprehensive and truly critical introduction to critical animal studies. David Farrell Krell, Professor Emeritus of Philosophy, DePaul University
